Ode to the House of English

O timeless force, thou hast etched thy presence upon my being Across these lived years, thou didst kindle a spark rich with meaning
We entered through Indian narratives, where the spirit spoke through simple lines

Hast thou not seen how Jayanta Mahapatra stripped hunger down to bone, Or Faustus' soul that dared too much, yet asked not why?

We beheld man dance within roles he was never allowed to own Kalam did lighten prosthetic limbs borne by children, and give their movement a chance again

Verse was made known within literary forms, where each line held its place “What in me is dark illumine,” Milton did write, and we found the self far from simple.

From the Neoclassical age, where reason held its ground, to modern minds that laboured as spider and bee.

Crusoe sailed through solitude, and his language carried us across worlds yet unseen.

Fairy tales danced with us, where Rapunzel waited in towers and wonder never asked to be explained

We stood with Shakespeare all along the way, where life lay undone and tragedy knew no mercy.

Through translation, meaning crossed tongues and lived anew in many voices
The page turned to the last of classics, and the department itself was written into it.

O Department, thou hast been more than space or name For in thy warmth, we found both voice and place to be.
And that, perhaps, is true literacy.
