A Voice of My Own

I borrowed voices for years—
the voice of expectations,
the voice of fear,
the voice that said “be less,”
“be quiet,”
“be someone else.”
Then I found my own.
It wasn't loud.
It was trembling,
uncertain,
almost afraid of being heard.
But I listened.
And slowly,
it grew.
Now I know—a voice doesn't need to shake the world
to matter.
Sometimes
it only needs
to tell the truth.

For Those Who Endured

In the morning, as my eyes unfold I think of the stories so often untold Of people whose dreams are like stars in the sky Were shattered by conflict as tears filled their eyes

I gaze at my roof, so sturdy and sound
But for many it's rubble upon sacred grounds
I stare at my hands so strong and secure Yet I ponder those hands that endure

The weight of oppression, the grip of despair
Yet they reach out saying, we will repair
The wounds are deep and the scars are real,
But their resilience is an unbreakable seal

So, let us remember the stories, the strength and the strive for these people and their enduring lives.
